Findings in the last paper were made by conducting research receiving financial support from the Baltic Research Programme project ‘Quantitative Data About Societal and Economic Transformations in the Regions of the Three Baltic States During the Last Hundred Years for the Analysis of Historical Transformations and the Overcoming of Future Challenges’ (BALTIC100), project No. EEA-RESEARCH-174, under the EEA Grant of Iceland, Liechtenstein and Norway Contract No. EEZ/BPP/VIAA/2021/3.

I thank Ola Honingdal Grytten (Department of Economics, NHH Norwegian School of Economics, Bergen), Ilmars Mežs (Vidzeme University of Applied Sciences, Valmiera, Latvia), Martin Klesment (Department of Contemporary History, Tartu University, Tartu, and the Estonian Institute for Population Studies, Tallinn University, Tallinn, Estonia) who are my collaborators on this project, and Domantas Jasilionis (Max Planck Institute for Demographic Research, Rostock, Germany and the Centre for Demographic Research, Vytautas Magnus University, Kaunas, Lithuania) who helped to improve the life tables for Lithuania (1925–1934) and generously shared data collected while implementing a previous collaborative project on the health crisis in the Baltic countries coordinated by the French National Demographic Research Institute (INED), which was hitherto only partially published.

The original English text of the book was edited by a native speaker of English (Australian), Albina Strunga. I also thank the anonymous reviewers from Springer Nature, whose criticism and advice helped improve the draft. All remaining substantive errors are solely the responsibility of the author.
