

Contents

|                                                                                                                                                                                                       |     |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| Introduction: Exploring an overlooked sociolinguistic phenomenon(The First Congress for Language X)Joshua A. Fishman . . . . .                                                         | 1   |
| The First Language Congress for AfrikaansLloyd Holliday . . . . .                                                                                                                          | 11  |
| The Academic Conference on the Reform of BelorussianOrthography and Alphabet (Minsk 1926): A unique non-event?Paul Wexler . . . . .                                                    | 31  |
| The First International Catalan Language Congress, Barcelona,13–18 October, 1906Joan Martí i Castell . . . . .                                                                         | 47  |
| Integration vs. particularism:The undeclared issue at the first “Dutch Congress” in 1849Roland Willemyns . . . . .                                                                     | 69  |
| The First Congress for Hebrew, orWhen is a congress not a congress?Lewis Glinert . . . . .                                                                                             | 85  |
| The First Congress of HindiRaja Ram Mehrotra . . . . .                                                                                                                                     | 117 |
| The first efforts to promote and develop IndonesianAnton M. Moeliono . . . . .                                                                                                             | 129 |
| The emergence of the Korean script as a symbol of Korean identityHarald Haarmann . . . . .                                                                                                 | 143 |
| The first philological conference for the establishment of theMacedonian alphabet and the Macedonian literary language:Its precedents and consequencesVictor A. Friedman . . . . . | 159 |

|                                                                                                                                       |     |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|
| The First Congress for MalayAsmah Haji Omar . . . . .                                                                      | 181 |
| The First Congress of Mayan Languages of Guatemala (1949)Julia Becker Richards . . . . .                                   | 199 |
| Language purism and propaganda: The First Congress for PolishKarol Janicki and Adam Jaworski . . . . .                     | 219 |
| The First Workshop on Quechua and Aymara WritingNancy H. Hornberger . . . . .                                              | 233 |
| The First Congress for Tok Pisin in 1973S. A. Wurm . . . . .                                                               | 257 |
| The First Turkish Language CongressJacob M. Landau . . . . .                                                               | 271 |
| The 1928 Ukrainian orthographyAndrij Hornjatkevyč . . . . .                                                                | 293 |
| Senegalese languages in education: The First Congress of WolofOmar Ka . . . . .                                            | 305 |
| The Tshernovits Conference revisited:The First World Conference for Yiddish, 85 years laterJoshua A. Fishman . . . . . | 321 |
| The “First Congress” phenomenon:Arriving at some general conclusionsJoshua A. Fishman . . . . .                        | 333 |
| Topical Index . . . . .                                                                                                               | 349 |